FOREWORD

My friends—when I am dead

Put no roses at my head But breathe a prayer for me instead As I wandered around an old churchyard on the outskirts of Dungarvan amongst the tombstones of bygone years it struck me that we Irish are not at all oquacious upon tombstones As matter of fact, we have peculiar ideas about graveyards in general We have a hard way of looking at God's acre and resting places of our dead They are barren and wind swept and almost any old stone is good enough to mark a rest ing place That is an old tradition coming down from the early Celtic Church St Ciarin said - Bury me where I die or let my bones lie white as the bones of the stag on the moun-tain The Celtic imagination concentrates not upon the body that is dead but upon the soul that lives There is in Ireland a great devotion to the Holy Souls but there is little or no devotion to the earthly graves in which their hodies he Now and then there is a little pride and bravery in the tombstones that rise above them but one feels that is a passing gesture and having done it one quickly for-

England where one sees such great care of their graveyards They enclose the graves with a They keep the grass cut and pay maintenance fees to a cemetery superintendent so that he may furnish flowering plants in due season I think At The Old Hall, Cappagh this is very nice, but, in my opinion a little prayer would go along ways instead, but we cannot have it both ways On the other hand it closes a chapter of 'their lived a man,' and it

The road is dark and lonely As the clouds of night descend While I struggle slowly I struggle slowly onwards On a load that soon must end I feel a strange foreboding For I fear the great unknown Into which I soon must enter Unfriendly and Unknown

Alone through death's sad To the region of my tomb I must go with none to lead

Through the fast approaching Alone without the comfort Of a friendly guiding hand r a tender voice to greet me When I reach that distant

How many countless thousands of non-praying non-practicing christians of today can this be said of Doesn't, it seems to be their true estimate in God's sight as well as in the gone God's sight as well as in the gone God's spaker in the performance of the grace of his soul on happy repose of his soul this be said of Doesn'th seem to be their true estimate in God's sight as well as in the sight of men Yet the Church seizes on just that and makes it the basis of its plea for mercy for that human soul. However a little more thought and care fer our dear departed ones in keeping their last resting place in a little order would not be too much out of the way, or one's pocket at least until we generation have gone home. I give herewith my poem entitled 'My Journey's End" as I find it suitable to my foreword—
