It may be said that from 1695 to 1 all things Gaelic were part of "The Hidden Ireland," dealt with so ably and heantifully in Daniel Corkery's recently published book. The Munster, Connaught and Ulster Gaelic poets composed and sung their beautiful Gaelic lyricanetheir aislings, elegion satires, elegion of that building within the past sally forth seeking what they may get hold of. And yet, in 9 cases out of 10, there is no remedy to meet this serious and grave evil. In the old days a police man could arrest them, bring them becautiful of the Lismore Courthouse be re-built or that splendid old town clock which did duty for a number of years faithfully nection with the Annals of the Four their aislings, elegies satires, etc.—but outside of their immediate friends, fellow despised and oppressed Gaels, their existence and their work were unknown or unheeded. The only literary activities in Irish during that period that bore fruit in printed books were the Irish Cathechisms and books of instruction produced at the Irish Colleges until Maynooth was established in 1705.
