The Duke of Arroyo asked, if the correspondence and documents which had been published were authentic, and the several points correctly stated?

Lord Moira answered, that they were faithful transcripts of the original papers, and correct, except as to a few typographical errors. He stated, that he gave the fullest credit to Lords Grey and Grenville...

Lord Erskine, in reply, contended, that the word "indispensable" added nothing to the meaning conveyed by the word "politic."

Lord Erskine said, that he entertained the same opinion with his Noble Friends, that it was a solid and constitutional principle in the formation of an Administration, that it should have the full, free, and explicit confidence of the Crown...

Lord Moira declared, that no insinuation of the kind alluded to ever slipped from him. He never supposed that there was in his mind any thing so injurious to the country, as a feeling of disrespect to the Prince...

In a letter written by Earl Moira to Colonel McMahon, dated June 25, 1793, when he had been appointed by some party men in the House of Commons to try to be an Administration, to the exclusion of Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, the Noble Lord wrote as follows...

We are sorry to say that the line ship, the Prince Regent, Capt. Trewin, which sailed from this port (on her first voyage) the 19th of March, was cast on shore on the 14th of April, five miles west of New Lisbon, on the coast of America, and is not expected to be got off...

considered it a menace to deter him from forwarding into Administration Lords Grey and Grenville. If he had known it more authentically, he would have kept it back from them out of respect...

Lord Erskine regretted that he had not foreseen the possibility of a difference in the construction of the minute, or he would have taken care that his Noble Friends should have closely understood each other.

The Chancellor concluded the conversation, by deprecating discussion of that nature, as tending to embarrass the Prince in the formation of all future Administrations, and conjured the House to put an end to them for the present by adjourning.

Mr. P. moved, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee, to take these Acts into consideration; his object was, as he had before stated, to propose the consolidation of the Irish Stamp Acts, a measure from which, in his opinion, considerable benefit would arise.

Mr. Fox said, the Right Hon. Baronet laboured under a considerable error respecting the two Bills which he had mentioned. The Bill respecting the Customs was brought in yesterday and read a first time, and was read a second time on this day.

Mr. Fox said, it was not necessary for him to trouble the Committee long upon this subject; he would merely state, that great inconvenience had arisen in consequence of the regulations respecting Stamps being contained in several Acts of Parliament. He proposed to consolidate all these various Acts of Parliament into one general Act, and to direct the Commissioners of Stamps to print in distinct parts the regulations attaching to the different heads of Stamps.

The Resolutions were agreed to. Mr. P. rose to bring in a Bill to regulate the Bacter trade in Ireland, by putting the whole of the Trade, with respect to the packing of the Bacter, on the same footing that it was in Cork.

Mr. W. Fox moved for and obtained leave to bring in a Bill for regulating the Baking Trade in Ireland. He said it was his intention, as this was a subject of great consequence, to move to have the Bill printed, and to let it stand over till the next Session. The Bill was brought in and read a first time.

they had intended to resign. He must approve and prize the propriety of that resolution, but must observe that they thereby distinctly recognized the principles stated in this Paper.

The following proceedings took place in the Commons on the 19th. Mr. W. P. moved, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee, to take these Acts into consideration; his object was, as he had before stated, to propose the consolidation of the Irish Stamp Acts, a measure from which, in his opinion, considerable benefit would arise.
