

On inquiry we understood, that, after the Bill had been read the third time, and on the question being put "that this Bill do now pass," His Majesty's Ministers, the number of whom in the House of Peers exactly corresponded with the majority for the third reading, intimated, as the opinions of their Lordships appeared to be nearly divided, they declined pressing the passing of the Bill.

THIRD EDITION. In a preceding column we announced the Victory of the Queen. As we wish to present the whole proceedings in our columns this day, we here resume the Report of the Debate, which we interrupted in order to announce the glorious result of this momentous inquiry.

The Bishop of Cisteria had voted for the second reading of the Bill upon the full conviction that her Majesty was guilty of the crime imputed to her. It was from a moral view of the question that he was induced to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but it would be recollected that he had decidedly given his opinion and his vote against the Divorce Clause. This he had done because he considered that class contrary to all established usages, and opposed to the Divine precept.

Here there were loud cries of "Question!"—Strangers were then ordered to withdraw, and the division was as already stated. On the question being put, that the Bill do now pass. The Earl of LIVERPOOL rose and said, convinced as he was of the necessity of this inquiry, and of the guilt of her Majesty, yet, persuaded as he was of the difficulty of imposing his conviction on the public mind, he felt it to be his duty to move, that the further consideration of this Bill be deferred to THIS DAY SIX MONTHS. At the same time he moved, that the further consideration of this Bill be deferred to THIS DAY SIX MONTHS. At the same time he moved, that the further consideration of this Bill be deferred to THIS DAY SIX MONTHS.

I have heard his most gracious Majesty compared to the most atrocious tyrant that ever disgraced a Throne. This was, indeed, an attempt to degrade his Majesty, and contained the most unparliamentary and unmerited attack upon Sovereignty that had ever been made; for he was convinced, that the Regency of his Majesty would bear a comparison with the proudest period of British history. The Learned Prelate then declared, that as he could not conscientiously vote against the Bill, being clearly of opinion that her Majesty was guilty, and as he could not conscientiously vote for the Divorce Clause, his impression with respect to that Clause remaining unchanged, he should withdraw himself from the House, and give no vote one way or the other.

Earl Grosvenor said it was impossible not to trespass upon their Lordships to take notice of what had fallen from the Learned Prelate. If he recollected right, he had stated what was supposed to have passed between his Majesty and his Ministers—that there had been rumours, which were fostered by Ministers, that the King had been the main cause of the agitation of the question, and that his Majesty had proposed the omission of the Queen's name in the Liturgy himself. He (Lord G.) had distinctly stated, that such rumours tended to dishonour and contempt upon the Crown, and were in every respect wicked and injurious; and he admitted that he had declared, that if he were in the place of an Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom such a proposition was made, he should not hesitate to throw aside panicle in the manner alluded to.

Lord Erskine took the opportunity to notice the argument of the Noble Lord on the Woolack, which was grounded on the case of the murdered man. The circumstances stated were certainly a strong presumption of guilt, but he begged to know what the Jury would have thought, if the person brought forward to prove the murder had declared in Court, that he had seen neither the bloody knife nor the murdered man? (Hear, hear, hear!) This was the case to which the present might indeed be compared, for he must assert, that to complete a contradiction to the statement of the Attorney-General had never been given, as that which appeared all thro' the evidence for the prosecution, from the mouths of the witnesses, not only in cross-examination, but in the direct examination of all the evidence.

The Duke of Grafton said, that after having looked with the greatest attention to the evidence for the Bill, and particularly to that of Mjorcelli and De Mont, he must, upon his honour and conscience, say, "Not Guilty." (Loud cries of Hear, hear!)

The Marquis of Hertford said he was as decidedly convinced of the Queen's guilt, as the Noble Duke seemed to be convinced of her innocence. The Marquis of Donalag assured their Lordships that he should give his vote as conscientiously as any of their Lordships, having suffered no bias to interfere with the conclusion arising from his examination of the evidence. He should vote against the Bill, as a measure injurious to all parties, as well as to the best interests of the Nation.

THE QUEEN. (FROM THE STAR OF SATURDAY.) No language can describe the scene of exultation and joy which yesterday spread like lightning over the Metropolis, as soon as it was announced that the Bill of Penalties—shaped in sin and brought forth in iniquity—was assigned to the tomb of all Capulets.

Deep and anxious were the inquiries in the morning respecting the probable issue of this diabolical measure; and no wonder, for Lord Liverpool, who, early in these detestable proceedings, declared, that unless the Bill in its progress should meet with the general concurrence of the House, he would cease to press the measure, had pressed the Bill into a Committee, though the majority had consisted of only twenty-eight for its second reading, and was known to be determined to force the Bill on to a third reading.
